Q: Interpreting Rust compiler logs When I submit a PR to the Rust project, the PR is sent to a "compiler" for review. The compiler log is usually something like this: File `src/lib.rs` is too big; it will be chopped up to fit. Which compiler(s) are this for? I'd like to understand what these messages mean and where they come from. Is it just the compiler that is logging things? Are these warnings or errors? A: The compiler generates these files for two reasons composability/backwards-compatibility of Rust code tracking down errors in the code Each project is responsible for creating a corresponding file to track errors. These are variously known as lib.rs, lib.rs.bc, src, or src.rs. They are written out in whatever format they need in order for the compiler to understand them, such as:

// compilers/rustc/lib.rs #[allow(missing_debug_implementations)] unsafe fn lib_foo(input: &'a mut [i32; 256]) -> bool { unimplemented!() } #[allow(missing_debug_implementations)] unsafe fn lib_bar(input: &'a mut [i32; 256]) -> bool { unreachable!() } // compilers/rustc/src/lib.rs #[allow(missing_debug_implementations)] unsafe fn lib_foo(input: &'a mut [i32; 256]) -> bool { unimplemented!() } #[allow(missing_debug_implementations)] unsafe fn lib_bar(input: &'a mut [i f678ea9f9e
